 - Even the most dedicated artists spend up to 80 percent of their time on the business side of their careers. Knowledge about business is crucial to their survival, but art schools rarely teach business. And separating people into "business" and "creative" silos is equally unfair to those with a head for business who aren't taught or encouraged to express themselves creatively. We will discuss the myths that surround creativity how to access yours by discovering what creativity really is, how you personally define success, how to overcome fear and doubt, and how to feed your natural creativity. We will focus on identifying opportunities, evaluating an idea's potential, and capturing the market's attention. The reader will learn how to make a living with those creative ideas by assessing risk, finding the right collaborators, and ultimately building an effective and meaningful brand. This is information that can benefit anyone, whether their goal is to be an entrepreneur or a creative, someone looking to make a career change, or an executive who works with creatives.*
